-ics (-ĭks). [See -IC.] A suffix used in the names of many sciences, arts, and systematic studies. Form: Such nouns as acoustics, athletics, dynamics, politics, statistics originally had in English the singular form, as still in arithmetic, logic, music, rhetoric; but since 1600 their plurals have been the regular forms, probably in imitation of the Greek ta physika, ta ethica, etc., although the singular of certain words also occurs, after French and German usage, as diagnostic, ethic, and metaphysic. Scientific and technical nouns have regularly adopted the plural form, as bionomics, ceramics, demotics, electronics, homiletics, kinetics, logistics, mnemonics, nucleonics, optics, pediatrics, pedagogics, prosthetics, systematics, therapeutics, pyrotechnics. Construction: As denoting a science or art or its subject matter nouns in -ics are now construed as singular (all linguistics is descriptive; genetics is an example of extreme specialization; strategy wins wars, tactics wins battles). As denoting concrete activities, practices, or phenomena such nouns are usually construed as plural (it has been questioned if gymnastics give real endurance; the mechanics of the gyroscope explain the gyrocompass; the phonetics of the language are minutely observed). A few nouns in -ics have acceptable uses in both singular and plural in the same sense (politics is, or are, completely barred; his politics was reactionary; his politics are the subject of debate; Russian tactics is to plunge forward; Japanese tactics were easily diagnosed).
